Fund Manager Commentary

Performance Overview

In March, leading global auto parts maker DENSO rose and added to performance on expectations of the positive effects of economic recovery. In addition, West Holdings, added value amid rising expectations for solar power as more companies declare net zero GHG emissions. On the other hand, Justsystems detracted from performance due to concerns over slower growth of online education as the economy normalises, following strong sales during the COVID-19 pandemic. Aoyama Zaisan Networks also underperformed on concerns about the negative impact of the stagnation of sales activities in the inheritance-related businesses as the virus continued to spread in Japan.

Market Outlook and Investment strategy

The Japanese stock market is likely to be volatile in the short term. In addition to the spread of the new coronavirus mutant strains, the volatility in U.S. interest rates is likely to make market participants more cautious in the near term. Without overreacting to short-term market developments, our bottom up research continues to focus on corporate business models and management attitude from a long-term perspective, investing selectively in high conviction stocks that we expect to grow earnings by contributing to solve social challenges. While COVID-19 is causing irreversible changes to people's lifestyles, we aim to generate returns by investing in stocks with growth prospects, taking advantage of the environmental changes and stocks that we expect to enjoy stable demand growth irrespective of economic growth.
